candidates realize that they are in a desperate struggle for the greatest honor the State can bestow upon one of her sons. Both are men of high character, and both are good campaigners, who have rendered their party valuable service on the stump.

Another thing which appears to be helping Mr. Tucker in this section is the claim set on his behalf that he has never been a bitter partisan in any of the factional fights that have beset the Democratic party in Virginia in recent years.

It is said of him in Nelson that during his long term of service in Congress he established the reputation of being able to shake hands with more farmers and less money babies in the course of a day than any other member.

Never a Partisan. Tucker's friends do not concede that the great bulk of the party leaders are for Judge Mann. They say, on the other hand, that the organization forces are badly divided, and that when the "showdown" comes, their favorite will have his full share of active party workers.

Interesting History. Nelson is peculiarly situated with reference to the liquor question, and the voters here, as a rule, do not look upon it as any great issue in the coming struggle.
